

Title: Are providers asking men about their sexual health?

Michael Setareh, MD
Taiwona Elliott, DO

INTRO

- The majority of men report sexual health is highly important to quality of life.
- Many of the diseases we treat, along with the treatments we utilize can drastically diminish men’s sexual function.
- 45% of men > 45 report sexual dysfunction.
- Clinicians do not routinely ask men about their sexual health.

METHODS

1. Surveyed clinicians:

Do you ask your male patients (>45) about their ability to obtain/maintain erections at least once per year?

2. Surveyed patients:

In the past year, has your provider asked you about your ability to obtain/maintain erections?

RESULTS

1. 31/36 (86.1%) men surveyed were not asked by clinicians.
2. 24/25 (96%) clinicians surveyed report they do not ask.

Clinicians at Alvernon Family Medicine are not asking men about their sexual health.

DISCUSSION

Our assumption was that clinicians at Alvernon Family Medicine are not asking men about their sexual health, which was confirmed by surveying both clinicians and patients. Most common reasons cited by clinicians for not asking were time and comfort/confidence. We believe that addressing the latter with a brief educational update could modestly improve the rate at which clinicians screen for male sexual health.

FAQ

How do I create a QR code?

- <https://www.qrcode-monkey.com/>
- <https://www.qrstuff.com/>

What if my intro/methods/results doesn't fit in the silent bar?

- If you're trying to put so much into that bar that it doesn't fit, they won't have time to read it anyway. First try moving stuff to the ammo bar. Next, cut cut cut.
- Instead of trying to fill space, you're trying to conserve space.

What if I have a really important graph or picture?

- Move the QR Code to the Silent Presenter, then put your graph/image in the middle.
